Summary

The majority of media reports monitored during the elections campaign strived to respect the journalistic code of ethics. This does not mean that they were balanced in terms of the exposure they dedicated to political parties and officials.

Nearly all the media outlets gave most exposure to PDK, and least to LDD. Most of them depicted PDK in positive context, while LDK and AKR lead in coverage with negative context. In most cases the media favored Hashim Thaçi and Veton Surroi, presenting them positively, while Fatmir Sejdiu and Behgjet Pacolli were presented in more negative light than other officials.

Most media outlets did not show any significant bias in the coverage of political parties. Some of them failed to be objective when reporting on the campaign, and continued their partisan support for a political party. The code of ethics was predominantly respected, whilst the language used during reporting was generally careful chosen.

The language used by media in covering political parties’ campaigns was rather mild. Most media carried were generally balanced in their reporting, with a tilt towards ‘their’ sympathy. In general, media reports in Kosovo during elections have contributed to a democratic environment where the majority of them have provided or tried to provide equal space for officials and main political parties and trying to present them in a neutral way.

Some of the print media (Lajm, InfoPress) showed severed cases of imbalanced journalism giving strong priority to specific political parties. Their language about other parties was generally correct and not meant to induce hatred toward rival political parties – more so to glorify specific officials of parties that they supported.

Some of the other media have supported a specific political party when exchanging accusations with another political party (Kosta Ditore/KTV toward Surroi) while some other media have defended politicians who were accused presenting them as innocent vis-a-vis accusations (Lajm toward Pacolli).

In most instances, these cases bring into doubt the financial and political independence of media, especially with Lajm and InfoPress which have expressed clear dependence toward specific political parties. This dependence has resulted with imbalanced reporting for all political parties.

During the campaign there has been a series of events which have marked main turning points and reactions by political parties: increase of pensions by the government, interview of Pacolli in Voice of America, the usage of official cars during the campaign, etc.

Electronic media have shown overall maturity, with better inter-party balance and higher than average exposure of minority political parties, especially the public channels. Some newspapers had the highest gender representation with both in news editions as well as in debates.

Introduction

This report outlines results of media monitoring during the electoral campaign from October 26 to November 16, 2007. The monitoring of media was implemented as part of the project for elections monitoring by NGOs coalition “Democracy in Action – Elections 2007”.

The first part lists the media which were monitored and explains the methodology used. The main body of the report has been dedicated to individual analyses about each medium separately. The final section compares media outlets with respect to the space offered to political parties, leaders, female candidates, etc.

Monitored media

The monitoring has covered three national televisions, six daily newspapers, and two radios with national frequency.

Electronic media:

RTK – Radio Television of Kosovo
KTV – Private television with national coverage
RTV 21 – Private television with national coverage
Radio Kosova – Public radio station with national coverage
Radio Dukagjini – Private radio station with national coverage

Television and radios were monitored during peak times:
From 07:00 a.m. - 09:30 a.m. – covered the latest news on the campaign of political parties and political parties officials invited as guests in television programs.
From 05:00 p.m. -11:00 p.m. – covered news editions, including debates with party officials.

Daily newspapers:

Koha Ditore, Zëri, Lajm, Express, InfoPress, and Epoka e re.

The media has been analyzed measuring:

a) journalistic presentation of political party candidates (presentation);
b) the context in which electoral activities were portrayed (context);
c) time/ space given to political parties and political officials (space/ time);
d) reporting on the activities of minority political parties; and
e) coverage of women campaigning.

The monitored media outlets were chosen based national coverage criteria, selling, readability, watching/ listening levels, and influence. Due to a limited budget it was impossible to monitor all national-level daily newspapers or radio stations.
The Methodology

Composed of 10 monitors, the team for media monitoring observed media during the election campaign in order to evaluate:

- If fair exposure was provided by the media to candidates and political parties;
- If political parties and candidates were presented in a neutral and balanced manner; and
- If it was possible for the public to be properly informed through the media in order to make a decision in the election day.

The content of media programs – news, reports, editorials and columns, debates, clips, political parties’ advertisements – was evaluated measuring:

- time\space which was dedicated for political parties and candidates;
- the context in which they were represented;
- presentation for political parties and candidates and replies\space remarks given to them by any other subject.

Whereas the quantity measures the space dedicated to a political subject or individual, two other categories measure depictions in terms of quality, estimating them as positive, negative or neutral.

Quantitative method: Media Space

The quantitative method measures the time (broadcast media) or the space (written media), presented in seconds or cm$^2$ respectively. Space here means the time or square centimeters in which a political party or political party official is mentioned, has spoken, cited or presented on TV screen.

Qualitative Method: The Context and Presentation

The measuring of time quantity dedicated to a political entity is insufficient to evaluate whether reporting was balanced. A political entity can be given ample space, but this exposure can be mainly negative. In this way, the monitoring has measured also the quality of the exposure, expressed as negative or positive. Analyzing the context and the mode of presentation, media monitoring has evaluated if the media reporting has a bias pro or against political parties or political officials.

Context is the bias of information from the context of the event not being influenced expressively by the journalist. The context can be positive, negative or a neutral one.

Presentation means the influence of journalist or media in the way how a piece of information is presented. This category evaluates the language used by the media\space journalist toward a political party of political party officials. The analysis has made a difference whether the information was used in a comment or news analysis, or if the news has been intertwined with a comment, the lack of certain information or similar substandard journalistic practices. Journalistic presentation has been categorized as positive, negative or neutral.

Data is presented mainly visually, but sometimes less important data have been summed up in the text. Being the first product of its kind by “Democracy in Action” it could not compare the results with those of previous elections.
